Course Description	The course surveys at how food appears as a social issue in modern and contemporary—meaning, post-Meiji to now—Japanese fiction and trans-Pacific fiction and documentary film. Half of the course uses works by Japanese writers; the other half looks at film and literature works by Canadian and US creators that follow the reception of Japanese food in the US. The purpose is to track shifting understandings of national cuisine and modernity in the 20th and 21st century and see how food works in both personal histories and collective histories. Students should emerge with a greater understanding of how food and the social issues surrounding it have changed in the modern era. Field trip/s to an organic farm, Yokohama Chinatown, restaurants in the “Tokyo Heterotopias” project, and the Yokohama Rāmen Museum to be discussed. (Field trip/s may be planned on a weekend. Details to be discussed with the class.)
Course Objectives	Students should emerge with a greater understanding of how food and the social issues surrounding it have changed in the modern era. Goals are: to identify and discuss current issues of food security, labor, food and eco-systems, modern attitudes to meat and vegetarianism, food and gender. And to give a short presentation on a current issue related to food in Tokyo, elsewhere in the Japanese archipelago, or trans-Pacific reception of Japanese food. Students should also be able to locate various social issues in literary works (aestheticism/Japonisme/Orientalism; public health; global trade relations and food; nostalgia, etc.). The final goal is to be able to speak and write clearly in a well-researched way in the “deliverables” of a short presentation and a short paper.
Expected work outside of class	Reading of short stories, excerpts of novels and/or critical essays. Preparation of homework assignments, such as discussion questions and a short presentation. (1.5-2 hours each class + independent research for presentation)
